These are specialized apps with their own uses, and you might as well go with the best. Which, in the case of word processors, is Microsoft Word itself! So if your goal is to create mailing lists, or organize a bibliography of articles you've written, or something along those lines, then in the grand scheme of things, anything you find that will cut down on data entry is probably going to help you a lot more than either the other programs or a third-party editor. I find it useful to have my bibliography generated using a bibliography database (e.g., Zotero), but I can see how it would be useful for someone in a business setting. Do any sites offer training on how to use the tool? If so, is it free? Thanks. Word file is a very efficient format that will ensure that any data you're storing in it won't be lost. Although there are a number of different ways to save the data that you want to secure, some of the most common methods involve a cloud-based service. However, many of these services charge a fee for the information they store. The cloud-based storage should be used only as a backup, and not as a preferred storage of data, so it's a very important decision to make when choosing the cloud-based service to use.
