Chance MorganThe sonographic diagnosis of genital malformations in pregnancy by the use of the computerized transducer. The first year experience of our computerized transducer in the diagnosis of genital malformations in pregnancy is reported. Presently, 55 patients have been examined; the nature of the malformations is as follows: 54 cases of persistent cloaca, 1 case of vaginal atresia, 1 case of imperforated anus, 1 case of ectopic vagina, 2 cases of urethral fistula. Four malformations have been diagnosed in the first trimester of pregnancy. The sonographic examination, performed as a supplement to the conventional ultrasound examination, has been an aid in the diagnosis of urogenital malformations and in the diagnosis of ectopic pregnancies.Fas regulation of human neutrophil survival. Human neutrophils undergo apoptosis in response to a wide range of agonists, including fMLP and cytokines such as GM-CSF and G-CSF. We investigated the relative contribution of the two main neutrophil death pathways, apoptosis and "secondary necrosis" or necroptosis, using the inhibitor of apoptosis, zVAD-fmk, and the necroptosis inhibitors necrostatin-1 and nec-1. We found that both apoptosis and necroptosis contributed to neutrophil death, and the relative contributions of each differed depending on the stimulus. In response to fMLP, cell death was predominantly apoptotic, with minimal cell death by necroptosis; however, when cells were stimulated with cytokines, the proportion of cell death by apoptosis was significantly reduced and cells predominantly died through necroptosis. Blockade of necroptosis with inhibitors resulted in a decreased proportion of cell death, the effect of zVAD-fmk was less marked when necroptosis was blocked. Together our data show that human neutrophils can undergo apoptosis and necroptosis in response to fMLP and cytokines and that the death pathways
