CD8+ T-cell function is an important determinant of immune control and disease progression in HIV-1 infection. This is most evident in the altered T-cell functions leading to immunodeficiency. In addition, there is evidence that the nature of CD8+ T-cell function differs between HIV-1-infected individuals. In contrast to diminished CD8+ T-cell functions in HIV-1 infection, increased numbers of cytotoxic T lymphocytes (CTL) have been observed in the peripheral blood of HIV-1-infected individuals. The factors that underlie this increased CTL formation are, at present, not defined but may include the participation of viral and/
