The Drosophila ovary is an excellent system for studying the induction, organisation and maintenance of the follicular epithelium. The follicular epithelium is organised from precursor cells, which develop from a group of cells with posterior daughter cells that remain in the epithelium during oogenesis. The precursor cells are induced to divide, localise to the anterior part of the ovariole and undergo a series of fates. The fate map of these cells determines the organisation of the oocyte in different follicle cells and thus the number of egg chambers. The fate map is also probably determining the determination of the germline fate in the precursor cells. The transcription factor, STAT92E is required for precursor cell specification and germline fate in the epidermal cells. Additionally, a number of other proteins that have been implicated in lineage determination have recently been identified, including Numb in the follicle cells and bam in the germline. We have employed a genetic approach to identify the molecular players involved in regulating the induction of these precursors. We have identified a set of genes that are required to induce and maintain the precursor cells.Diabetes: In the Shadows of Provoking By Nicole Vasquez (Page 2 of 3) His thick mustache and proud smile were designed to frame a vulnerable look in a survey of waist sizes. Too thin, too fat, or just about right? In hospitals that mostly didn't serve minorities, Juan Cuellar averaged 25 pounds of patient weight, "probably because we're carrying them in our arms," as the top 40th-percentile and Hispanic. In a community that isn't diverse, El Paso nurse Sarah Turney noticed at one hospital that all the Hispanic patients were typically carrying weight. "People don't go to a doctor if they don't feel uncomfortable," Cuellar
