The Ultimate Guide To Computer Monitor Refurb If you've ever bought a new computer, you've been informed by sales clerks that your current monitor is not compatible with the new graphics card you've just purchased. The newest models on the market are often better, so most customers should be very excited with the new model that they receive. But, if you are not happy with the new graphics card, you will be forced to get a monitor that has a different resolution than the one you are accustomed to, or look for another graphics card. There are few things more frustrating than having to replace a graphics card just because of a new model of monitor. This guide will show you the differences between monitors and graphics cards, and will show you ways to improve your current setup. What Makes A Monitor Different From A Graphics Card? A graphics card handles everything from image processing to speeding up your CPU and RAM. A monitor just displays images that are sent by the graphics card. This means that you must have a graphics card that has a
