metastasis of human cancers. We investigated the role of CXCR3 and CXCL10 in human breast cancer progression by determining their expression in tumours, lung and liver metastases, and directly correlated their expression with metastatic potential in vitro and in vivo. Twenty-six normal tissue samples were used as controls. Expression of CXCR3 was elevated in primary breast tumours and liver metastases compared to normal breast tissue, but was reduced in the lung metastases, and CXCL10 was elevated in primary tumours, liver metastases, and lung metastases compared to normal breast tissue. The expression of CXCR3 was significantly associated with tumour grade, lymph node metastasis, oestrogen receptor (ER) and progesterone receptor (PR) status. CXCL10 expression was significantly associated with tumour grade, lymph node metastasis, ER and PR status. However, there was no correlation between the expression of CXCR3 or CXCL10 and disease-free survival, or overall survival. In vitro, the secretion of CXCR3 ligand (CXCL10) by breast cancer cell lines significantly enhanced their invasiveness in a transwell invasion assay.

Additionally, nude mice inoculated with CXCR3-expressing MDA-MB-435 cells developed lung metastases and liver metastases. Our findings demonstrate that CXCR3 and CXCL10 are associated with the breast cancer metastatic process and may be of diagnostic and therapeutic significance in the treatment of breast cancer.
