Image from google books.Alteration of the human Müllerian duct structure and of gonad differentiation in infertile women. We studied a total of 24 patients with different types of infertility in order to determine whether alterations in the Müllerian duct structure or in gonad differentiation existed in these patients. Particular attention was paid to the morphology and differentiation of the Müllerian duct, which was evaluated histologically. Histological findings and hormonal data in ovarian and tubal (cervical, periovarian, and round ligament) patients also were analyzed. Histologically, the Müllerian duct in infertile women was found to have a wider lumen, more epithelium, a thicker muscular layer, and less collagen than the normal duct. Histological grades showed no correlation to the hormonal results or to the clinical findings. Tubal patients revealed a positive correlation between the Müllerian duct structure and the spermatogenic function of the testes and between abnormal findings of the Müllerian duct and elevated levels of FSH and LH. In conclusion, these observations suggest that the histological differentiation of the Müllerian duct plays an important role in tubal infertility.Q: How to correctly use Work
