In a 5-2 split decision, the court dismissed an appeal from one of Australia's most infamous criminal cases. Kerry Lawrence pleaded guilty to one count of sexual intercourse with a male of the same sex in 1993, an offence at that time punishable by two years' jail. The incident occurred in a Perth park, when Lawrence was 21 and a fellow student at the University of WA. In sentencing, Perth District Court Justice Melinda Kumpally said Lawrence was a well-meaning person with few prospects in life and was unlikely to reoffend. In a Facebook post, Lawrence described his remorse as overwhelming. He has since built a successful career and is married with a child. In an unusual split decision, the court found Lawrence was not a danger to society and therefore should not be imprisoned. In arguments before the court last year, Lawrence's lawyers had argued that imprisonment was not the only way to protect the community. They also argued Lawrence suffered lifelong damage from his crime. In his written judgment, Supreme Court President Roslyn Atkinson said he accepted Lawrence was a good person, but there was no doubt in his mind that he would repeat the offence if given the opportunity
