Adobe Photoshop Lightroom is a newer, more streamlined version of Photoshop that can create and edit photos. This new program enables you to work on images that have not yet been fully edited in Photoshop, which is helpful when you're making changes to the end product. You can also use Lightroom to edit your images after they've been fully edited in Photoshop. The techniques that you employ when editing photos depend on the style of a particular image. The following sections describe basic and advanced editing techniques for four very common types of images: portraits, landscapes, still life, and conceptual. Photoshop techniques for portraits When editing your portrait images, think in terms of how you would approach the treatment of a subject before you took the picture. (Ideally, you should be doing this all the time.) To make the most of your final portrait, you should: Use a larger aperture than is recommended for the specified exposure. Make sure that you have the right aperture setting for the type of lens you're using. Ensure that you have enough ambient light. There is no substitute for good light. An exposure without light is too dark. Ensure that you are using the correct exposure. Check the file after your session to ensure that the image is exposed correctly. Use an image-editing program to brighten, sharpen, desaturate, and adjust exposure. Sharpening effectively reduces some of the softness in the photo, making the image appear more professional and well-composed, and the exposure can be adjusted easily with settings like Exposure Compensation, as shown in Figure 4-3. Illustration by Wiley, Composition Services Graphics Figure 4-3: Sharpen the subject's eyes to make them appear more prominent. Photoshop techniques for landscapes After you master the essential basics of editing, you can apply all the more complex effects to your landscape images. Your goal here is to make the landscape appear more realistic and to enhance the beauty of the subject matter. Use the techniques that you employ to edit portraits of landscapes, but in a different order. Avoid using a strong light source, such as a flash, in order to avoid creating a slightly soft and overexposed image. Plan ahead for the time it takes to create a real landscape. Go to a location that offers a wide variety of foregrounds, objects, and backgrounds that can be used to create interesting, unique images. Light painting and sketching are great

This invention relates to reflective liquid crystal devices and, more particularly, to wavelength multiplexed reflective liquid crystal devices. Reflective liquid crystal devices can be used in numerous applications, such as projection televisions and rear view mirrors. In a reflective liquid crystal display system, incident light is modulated in accordance with an input image signal and is subsequently reflected from an upper surface of the liquid crystal device. The transmitted light is modulated in accordance with the input image signal and the modulated light is subsequently reflected from the lower surface of the liquid crystal device. The total light transmitted by the liquid crystal device and the light reflected from the lower surface thereof will vary with a change in the input image signal. Light that is reflected from the lower surface of the liquid crystal device can be modulated in a manner consistent with the modulation of the incident light so that the change in the input image signal can be translated to a change in intensity of the reflected light. The reflected light intensity can be controlled by varying the alignment of the liquid crystal material that is interposed between the upper and lower surfaces of the liquid crystal device, i.e., by varying the state of the liquid crystal material. The alignment of the liquid crystal material can be affected by a voltage applied across the upper and lower surfaces. The incident light can be modulated by varying the intensity of the incident light. Since incident light is a modulating light, it is referred to in the art as "modulating light." If the light is modulated in accordance with a first input image signal, the incident light can be modulated in accordance with a second input image signal. The liquid crystal material is driven by the second input image signal and light that is reflected from the lower surface of the liquid crystal device is modulated in accordance with the second input image signal. For a given liquid crystal material, a maximum light transmission will occur when the alignment of the liquid crystal material is in a clear condition, i.e., the liquid crystal material is in an isotropic state. A clear condition is defined by a condition where the liquid crystal material is aligned in a manner such that a corresponding major axis of the liquid crystal material extends in parallel with the upper and lower surfaces. That is, the major axis of the liquid crystal material is aligned approximately at a right angle to the upper and lower surfaces. A change in the alignment of the liquid crystal material from the clear condition to a particular aligning condition will decrease the light transmission. As long as the alignment of the liquid crystal material

Swan 508 The Swan 508 was a Swiss light aircraft designed and built by the Swiss company Walter. It was a single engine monoplane with tricycle undercarriage. Design and development The Swan 508 was a development of the earlier Swans single seat training aircraft. The Swan 508 was designed to be cheap and simple to produce, with the intention of winning a Swiss government contest to manufacture the training aircraft for the Swiss Army. As such, the Swan 508 was a low-wing cantilever monoplane with the single engine (the type of engine was not specified) mounted over the wing. The cockpit was enclosed with a perspex canopy. The aircraft had a fixed conventional landing gear with a main wheel on a skid and a nose wheel on a dolly. The prototype first flew in October 1955 and about 50 aircraft were built for the Swiss Army. Operational history In 1958, Sweden bought up the Swan 508 series for use by the Swedish Air Force, with at least 42 being in service by the mid 1960s. Ten more were bought by Ilford, a manufacturer of photographic equipment, and used by them for aerial surveys. In 1962, the Swedish Air Force dropped the Swan 508 as their training aircraft. Other nations, including Norway, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union still operated the aircraft. Two of the Swedish Air Force's Swans were involved in the fatal crash of a Swedish Air Force Six on 2 September 1967. In 2008, the Swan 508 is still in service with the Swiss Army and the Swiss police. Variants Swan 508 Prototype one built in 1955. Swan 508-1 One built as a prototype in 1955.
