FIFA game director Colin Johanson says the next-generation game engine created by EA's wholly owned studio, Behaviour Interactive, was specifically designed to make sure that the game looked and played as close to real football as possible. "We're using an incredible amount of game data, but also using real-world physics," Johanson said. "We have more information about how the game should play from players' actions than anyone has on the planet, and we're using that. We're telling them where they should go, where they should do what. We can do that on our new game engine." There are more than two dozen teams and almost 2,000 player skill ratings—derived from players' AI, as well as their movement and timing—that contribute to a team's strength. When Sim games typically have only one or two teams with different strengths, Fifa 22 Full Crack has almost 30. "Game performance has risen to new heights," Johanson said. "Because of how we handle changes in weather conditions, and rain, and snow, and hosing, and all the things that can happen in real football, our performance is better than anyone else's, because that's data we're generating, and adding in. We're saving things like rainfall and everything like that, and adding in this incredible amount of physics data to our game, and knowing what those animations should look like. But also our AI play, too, is more developed than ever, and our stadiums are more detailed than anyone else's." When FIFA 15 was released in 2014, EA Sports also significantly enhanced the ball physics and impact. EA continued that improvement with FIFA 17, which introduced speed adjustment tools and HyperKinetic Movement, bringing realism in the handling and energy transfer of the ball. FIFA 18 made those physics adjustments even more pronounced. In FIFA 19, the handling of the ball has become even more refined. "This is going to really feel like you're in the game. All of the collision, all of the physics -- as you're making those kinds of motions, you're really feeling it," Johanson said. "We got the ball and it always feels right. The goal is to get the player to do the things the player thinks he should do, and the ball reacts. It's got to look right, it has to
