Anti-tumor effect of alginates via inhibition of matrix metalloproteinases and induction of apoptosis in human brain tumor cells. Alginates are natural polysaccharides extracted from brown algae. A new marine oligo-alginate was recently found to inhibit tumor growth in a mouse model of human brain tumor. In the present study, we demonstrate the anti-tumor effect of this oligo-alginate in vitro. Two human glioblastoma cell lines, U87 and U251, were cultured in alginate matrix prepared from the same oligo-alginate, and cell proliferation was assessed by MTT assay. A coculture technique was also applied to analyze the anti-tumor effect of the oligo-alginate on U251 human glioblastoma cells in tumor spheroids. Histopathology and Western blot analysis were carried out to analyze the possible underlying mechanism of action. Alginate matrix significantly inhibited the proliferation of U87 and U251 human glioblastoma cells when cultured in alginate matrix, as compared to those cultured in alginate suspension. Coculture of U251 tumor spheroids with oligo-alginate markedly inhibited the tumor spheroid growth in alginate matrix. In addition, oligo-alginate also

Current owners of Grand Theft Auto IV.Q: Is there a way to get AutoMapper to ignore the properties of a type I'm configuring it for? I have a type called Row. I have a nested sub-type called RowHeader. I want to configure a mapping for Row to ignore the RowHeader properties of the object that I am mapping. How is that possible? The example below doesn't work, but it gives the idea. var mapper = Mapper.CreateMap(); mapper.Include().Ignore();
