An FCC rule proposed on Tuesday would force businesses to include extra public notices online and in newspapers, magazines, and public access television and radio. The rules would also require explicit public notices during broadcasts. Under the rule, a sign that a business will be closed when a broadcast ends would have to be posted on any media outlet covering the news. Under the proposal, which has met with stiff resistance from media companies and other publishers, a notice must be posted online immediately after a broadcast ends, and in print or on audio or video media not covered by the business, at least 10 days prior to the business's closing. Businesses subject to the rule would also have to post an explicit public notice in weekly publications published by print or Internet media, such as newspapers or magazines, at least five days prior to the business's closing. The existing rule requiring explicit public notices during TV and radio broadcasts and sign-language translations of local cablecasts was passed in 2008 after businesses were holding TV and radio broadcasts to announce they would be closing. This practice rose to the FCC's attention after the January 2008 death of Harriet Glassman, a Brooklyn resident who died in a Brooklyn hospital of congestive heart failure after spending a week in a local emergency room awaiting treatment that never came. The rule passed last year allows businesses to bypass public notice requirements if they make "reasonable efforts to provide an adequate notice" to residents. Under the proposed rule, the FCC can require businesses to send notices in hard copy publications only after receiving a complaint. FCC Commissioner Meredith Attwell Baker said the rule reflects a growing concern over
