Such diagnostics may be used to quickly repair equipment that has failed, assist in the design of a new machine, or perform routine maintenance. Such diagnostics may be performed on any equipment that includes moving parts, such as the components of a machine or an automobile. In the manufacturing industry, equipment is routinely shipped from one location to another. One or more components of the equipment may not be tested until the equipment arrives at a destination location. Unfortunately, such equipment typically does not include diagnostic components such as sensors that allow the equipment to "self-diagnose" when it arrives at the destination location. Thus, the manufacturer must "diagnose" the equipment at the destination location by sampling and analyzing the components that fail and are believed to be defective. Such diagnosis typically requires a comprehensive analysis of the components that fail to determine the root cause of the failure. This diagnosis process is typically repeated several times until the manufacturer is able to fully identify the root cause of the failures. As a result of this procedure, the manufacturer may spend considerable time and resources analyzing the failures. For example, for each failure, the manufacturer may need to obtain samples of a few or many of the parts that failed, perform tests to establish the cause of the failure, analyze the results, and repeat the analysis several times to determine the root cause of the failures. Moreover, such analysis is usually done separately for each part that failed. As a result, the manufacturer may spend a considerable amount of time performing the analysis to determine the root cause of the failures.Methodology Censuses survey the real estate market and estimate property values.
