What's new:

A one-shot story about a crossdresser bard. So, I'll leave this story alone here. I'll put a main page up with the title and description at some point. In the distant future, a world called Warldia has just come out of a civil war. Now far along in the centuries, the Capital city has metamorphosed. Under the queen's rule, nature and survival are a part of the lives of all in this world. A new series in the archives are about to begin with the woman whom lives inside and out, always struggling to determine a place in a world within a world. James tells you about the story. "Who might you be?" Harry turned around slightly, staring with a raised brow and a half-smile at the half-drunk strange man sitting in the next stall, a filthy armrest in between them. The world was scary, did he know this fellow? What was he doing in the amusement park anyway? For that matter, who was he? "My name is Matt. Or mat-- Well actually, I'm not much for names these days. I'm, uh, really not much for any of that, being a transvestite, that is. Trans is a better term for my kind than, uh, crossdresser would be. Anyways." "A transvestite?" "Yes, that's the best term for what I am. A walking, talking paradox. Don't say you're not a fan of paradoxes, it'll be a short discussion you'll have with your new...friend." Harry frowned. "OK, so, uh, how did you get stuck in this room? It's not like the amusement park has another door around here, right?" In a quieter tone of voice, "You'll see that soon enough, unless you want to try something later...like, willingly. Act as if what we're doing right now is natural, and you probably won't have that problem." Matt finished his drink and set his glass down on the desk between them, before looking back at Harry with a wide smirk. "What a predicament you're in," Matt said, leaning against the wooden panel, leaning forward and wrapping his hands around Harry's knees, looking pensive for a moment, "I wonder what you'll do now. You're an interesting individual. And so unique. Not
