Plasmodium ookinete adhesins: functional insights from genetic polymorphisms and insights into the immunological functions of their orthologs in the mammalian malaria parasite. Genetic diversity of Plasmodium ookinetes is remarkably high, and it is hypothesized that this variation allows them to interact with the host vascular endothelium. Two families of proteins, the retinol binding protein-related proteins (RBP-r) and the ookinete surface antigen (OsSAG)-1, are implicated in this activity. In this study, we show that genetic diversity is restricted at the N-terminus of the adhesins, which suggests that the region is a determinant of ookinete invasion activity. This and other sequence data are used to examine and compare the immunological function of the two groups of protein. Homologues of the RBP-r proteins are immune-dominant in the rodent malaria parasite Plasmodium berghei, whereas OsSAG-1-related proteins are dominant in the malaria parasite that infects primates. Plasmodium berghei can be used as a model to show that antibodies against the RBP-r family are associated with protection against a lethal challenge with the murine malaria parasite Plasmodium chabaudi adami. Antibodies against OsSAG-1 antigens do not offer cross-protection between human and rodent malaria, but hamper ookinete invasion in vitro. Together these data suggest that parasites that infect the same host can exhibit different sets of polymorphic proteins that interact with the host to invade different subcellular compartments. In spite of this, important similarities are highlighted between the two groups of proteins, which is of significance to vaccine design. Concurrent linearization and partial-cartilage coverage of the femoral head in developmental dysplasia. To evaluate the effectiveness of concurrent linearization and partial-cartilage coverage of the femoral head in developmental dysplasia (DD). Fifty-two hips (40 patients) that had DD and were treated with a concurrent implantation of the Lin-Cal-Flex cups, performed at the beginning e79caf774b
