To develop appropriate strategies for eradicating and preventing nosocomial infections, it is important to identify the transmission routes for bacterial transmission from the environment to patients and investigate the survival rate of the bacteria in the environment. To determine the survival rate of pathogenic bacteria in the environment in a hospital ward and to clarify the transmission route from the patient's room to the environment. Bacteria were added to floor material (peripapillary-colored polyethylene terephthalate [PET] plates) in a patient's room for three days. The number of bacteria in the environment of the room was counted at times 0, 2, 4, 8, 16, 32 and 64 h after contamination. There was no difference in the ability to survive in the room environment among clinical isolates of the same species. Moreover, the number of bacteria in the environment of the room increased more quickly as the number of bacteria in the patient's rectum increased. PET plates may be useful to determine the potential routes of transmission of nosocomial pathogens from the environment to patients and to evaluate the appropriate methods for disinfecting these areas.Fuel cells are used as an electrochemical energy conversion device by reacting hydrogen with oxygen to create electrical energy. Fuel cells are used as a potential source of power in many applications, including mobile, stationary, and vehicular applications. While fuel cells can be used to react hydrogen and oxygen to form water as a byproduct, for example, fuel cells may be used to react hydrogen and oxygen to create electrical energy. Fuel cells may be used to produce useful power, for example, to power automobiles. The hydrogen for fuel cells can be obtained from many different sources, for example, from the combustion of natural gas or methanol, from reforming processes, and the like.
