Socially accepted performance scales for large animal species of the United States Department of Agriculture. Performance evaluation is a longstanding and important method of training, selection, and management of livestock. However, the use of unvalidated and unstandardized scoring systems is widespread. These methods are likely to be unreliable, and this widespread use may result in illegal movement of livestock across state lines. Legal challenges and management issues will continue to increase if and when the efficacy of scoring systems to measure performance in these species are not documented. We propose performance scales and methodology for the new management technique known as Parelli Performance Score (PPS) that can be used to measure and evaluate the performance of large animal species. This research documented the effects of scale use on agreement between observers and the accuracy of comparisons between individuals. One hundred fifty-one adult cows, 175 adult steers, and 174 adult bulls were evaluated at a University of Nebraska Test Center from 2007 to 2011. Multivariate analysis of variance was used to identify differences in scale ranking and agreement between observers. There were no differences between the ranking of live animals by PPS and the same animals by a farmer's assessment. The live animal model accurately identified individual bulls (weighted kappa [kw] = 0.75), cows (kw = 0.79), and steers (kw = 0.79) as each animal aged. There were no differences between PPS of pasture-raised and feedlot steers. The research documented the development and validation of a performance scale and methodology for use in large animal species of the United States Department of Agriculture (USDA) that can be used to evaluate and compare live animals in a given species without the need for weight.
