I have a requirement that keeps a "Master" List of Movies in a SQL Server database. Whenever the user navigates to another page, I grab the information and update the list and the UI. My current solution is to assign the objects to be used on the page to a ViewModel, then when the user clicks a button, I just call ToList() and assign the object list to the viewmodel. This seems pretty inefficient to me. The problem is that I need to be able to page through the whole list. If the list is big, this could take awhile if I have to make a new "Page" request for every 10th object.

Is there some way to push these objects into memory as soon as I grab them and keep them there as they get loaded into the UI? This is all in .NET 3.5 and ASP.NET EDIT: I guess I wasn't very clear on my question. My current solution is to make this a queryable list. I've just finished
