Conventional radionuclide imaging (e.g. single photon emission computed tomography, SPECT) detects gamma photons from a tagged substance (typically a radioisotope) within a patient's body, and generates a radionuclide image indicating the location of the tagged substance. For example, an imaging agent such as a radiolabeled gamma-emitting radionuclide can be used to form a radionuclide image of the blood pool, lungs, heart, bones, kidneys, and other organ systems. Blood pool imaging typically uses a radionuclide that emits a high-energy gamma ray (~140 keV), which is rapidly absorbed by red blood cells in the blood pool. Such absorption of the high-energy gamma rays results in annihilation events, and thus, detection of the annihilation events by a gamma camera generates a blood pool image. In cardiac applications, blood pool imaging can be used to determine cardiac function, pulmonary function, global and regional ventricular functions, and perfusion defects. Blood pool imaging is often combined with left ventricle (LV) wall motion imaging to provide both a ventricular function and perfusion analysis. The quantitative analysis of LV blood pool/wall motion requires, among other things, estimation of the end-diastolic (ED) and end-systolic (ES) volumes of the LV cavity. However, in practice, the short list of nuclides suitable for creating LV images often include two
